ISABEL SUPPÉ: CLIMBING PAST THE IMPOSSIBLE
Starry Night, 2013 US Tour

While climbing in July 2010, Isabel fell 1,100 feet off Ala Izquierda del Condoriri's southeast face in the Bolivian Andes. Stranded with a severely exposed fracture, Isabel crawled over jagged ice and rock for two days at 16,000 feet above sea level before finally being rescued. Soon after, she was told that she would never climb again. Three weeks later, she was climbing up a rock wall in a cast.

Isabel defied all odds and refused to believe that she would never be able to climb again. She successfully became the first woman to create a new climbing line on Serkhe Kholu in the Bolivian Andes just one year after her accident. A very difficult route, she summited solo and on crutches!

Beginning in June 2013, Isabel Suppé will be traveling across the US promoting her book, Starry Night, which tells the full story of her survival, resilience, and passion for adventure. Not your typical book signing and speaking tour, Isabel will begin in New York City visiting various cities in the east before she heads to Washington State to cycle all the way to Colorado giving presentations and hosting book signings along the way.
